A KISS IN THE RAIN.

[Samuel McIntire Peck in The Century.]
One stormy night I chanced to meet A lassie in the rain, that day when
Her locks were like the ripened wheat,
Her laughing eyes were brown.
I watched her as she tripped along
Till madness filled my brain;
And then—then—then—I knew 'twas wrong—
I kissed her in the rain.
With rain-drops shining on her cheek,
Like dew-drops on a rose,
The little lassie strove to speak
My boldness to oppose.
She strove in vain, and quivering
Her finger stole in mine;
And then the lassie began to sing,
The sun began to shine.
On, let the clouds grow dark above,
My heart is light below;
'Tis always summer when we love,
However winds may blow;
And I'm as proud as any prince,
All honors I disdain;
She says I am her rain-bird since
I kissed her in the rain.

A PAIR OF MUTES.

Mr. Spencer was an attorney with something of a fortune, and of the comfortable age of five and thirty; that age when man is at his best physically and nature has filled out his frame with the necessary padding of flesh without obesity—when the wrinkles are not in his neck nor gray hairs in his temples, although at that age he is apt to be "well set" in his ways.
The past winter had been one of unusually hard work, but not without pecuniary returns, so that when he was seriously threatened with paralysis of the throat, and upon consulting an eminent physician was told that rest and absolute silence were his only hope, he felt that he had earned his vacation, but at a rather high price. He was ordered to make no vocal sound, his worn-out muscles were to be laid entirely alone to recuperate for at least three months. If he had anything to say it must be done in writing, but not a word on pain of entire loss of speech. As the summer vacation was at hand he selected a home in the country as his place of exile, for when one has friends and a long vacation, it is a wise one, for the farmer and his wife were quiet, intelligent people, whose children were all married and in homes of their own. The house was pleasantly situated near a river, so there was plenty of fishing and boating. To a man who had been so long in the city this kind of life had much to recommend it, for he had not much play in it for him but had been made up of work. In his struggle for a place in life he had become rather cynical, especially about women, and knew practically nothing about them. His theories about them were almost heathenish, but they were only theories. He disliked the sex on what was vaguely called "general principles," and shunned them, one and all. On his arrival he found a young woman of two rooms, one large, the other somewhat smaller; true to his manhood, he took the biggest. More room for boots to stand round in and scatter pipes and such mainly belongings. He had a pleasant surprise when he found with his books, fishing rods, cigars and all those things which seem necessary to a man who is reaching that period of bachelorhood called confirmed.

Before his coming all the arrangements for his stay had been made by letter, and on his arrival, he found a young woman of two rooms, one large, the other somewhat smaller; true to his manhood, he took the biggest. More room for boots to stand round in and scatter pipes and such mainly belongings. He had a pleasant surprise when he found with his books, fishing rods, cigars and all those things which seem necessary to a man who is reaching that period of bachelorhood called confirmed.

"Olive-tree," and as he was a little out of spirits,
the national feeling of men without family ties on holidays, Mr. Spencer concluded to go.

After being shown to his seat he idly looked over the house, but saw no acquaintances. Just behind him he heard a soft unfamiliar voice say: "Sue, it is he." "Who?"
asked Sue. "Why, Mr. Spencer, the deaf man," said the young woman who was so kind to me last night. I will not force my confidence on any one." When she went neither knew where the home of the other was, and they parted, as they supposed, to never see each other again. She returned to her school rested and refreshed. He stayed until the last of October,
